I. What is a government?

A government is a body of organisation which regulates the functioning of a state and the society. Its role is to supervise public affairs and set policy direction through the executive and legislative mechanisms. In the modern day, the conception of the government can come from the two main directions when it comes to the source of its legitimacy.

- Democracy - describes the amount of control that the general population holds over the running of the country and formation of the government. It also can refer to a society holding values and norms which are ostensibly translated into formal judicial and political process. A full democracy is a system in which an already established political landscape serves to uphold civil liberties and fundamental political rights not only through a legal framework but through narrative consensus around the political discourse.
- Autocracy - describes a political system in which a single person or entity holds absolute power over the state. In the historical context, the autocracy usually took one of the three forms, despotism, oligarchy, and fascism. Contemporary, it often takes the form of a dictatorship, where power over the state is established through control of the military.

It is important to remember however, that in the contemporary context, the lines in between the autocratic and democratic governments have been put under a strain from the political landscape of the recent decades, that especially during the so-called war on terror, have labelled any government working outside of the rule-based international order created by the United States as ontologically evil and authoritarian. While there is an undeniable and material difference between an autocracy and a democracy, it is important to remain objective when analysing a political system of the nation and avoid arguments created for a sole purpose of justifying military or economic action against a given state.

Third Millennium Capitalism Wyatt Rogers, 2000-02-28 The Third Millennium presents unprecedented opportunities and challenges to capitalism as a global economic system Technological advances governmental policies energy supply ecological concerns and a burgeoning world population are among the issues to be addressed by private enterprise in holistic and humanitarian ways No longer can these issues be treated in isolation inasmuch as they are becoming increasingly interdependent As Rogers shows in industrialized nations with their aging and stabilizing populations the marketplace and the working environment are changing requiring new approaches to work and leisure In sharp contrast populations in the Third World are growing rapidly and represent vast potential new markets for the private sector Simultaneously enormous social health and political problems abound in many Third World countries that may be addressed by private sector and governmental initiatives Economic expansion in Third World nations will require great expansion of electric and other energy systems resulting in increased environmental degradation unless major preventive measures are taken Continued growth of energy systems in industrialized nations will require the introduction of increased pollution controls in the near future A definitive transition from dependence on fossil fuels to nonpolluting renewable energy sources should be a major global priority Environmental protection efforts previously confined to major industrialized nations should become a high priority issue on a global basis Global climate change and other air pollution desertification deforestation loss of biodiversity and water pollution are extending into formerly pristine areas forcing international approaches to mitigation A challenging assessment for business officers policy analysts and economists involved with corporate strategy and economic development
