

Phallic Worship to a Secularized Sex Rise and Decline of Religiosity THOMAS SCHLESINGER

This is an attempt to present a condensed and suggestive picture of the rise and decline of religiosity. The viewpoint is that of an evolutionary psychologist. Therefore the reference is to the religious temperament instead of theology, creedal formulation, or ecclesiastical institutions. The question is much concerned with the rise and decline of the emotional valuations which originate in sex. It will be shown how these emotions were transferred from sex to many other objects, and have been rationalized as an innumerable variety of metaphysical and theological theories. Through all this evolution there is apparent both a rise and a decline in non-religious emotional valuations as to many other subjects. From such a retrospective evolution we may construct a reasonable theory of the prospective evolution of human attitudes toward both religion and sex.

The data upon which these general conclusions are based were derived from years of research in the fields of religious psychology. This included much reading about phallic worship. The conclusions are further based upon, and checked by reference to, a general concept of evolution. One aspect of this is expressed in the theory that the individual's growth is a condensed recapitulation of the evolution of the race. Another is formulated as progress from an inchoate homogeneity to a coherent heterogeneity. Among all the objects of worship, a maximum of tenderness and of homogeneity are found in sex-worship. Therefore I consider that it was the first. In this connection it is important to note that even in our day the period of adolescence and pubescence is the age of conversion, that is for the conscious adoption of religious values and the religious habit. Our theory of evolutionary recapitulation therefore suggests that the beginning of religion came with the dawn of self-consciousness, that is, of racial adolescence. The process of our intellectual evolution and scientific development consists largely in the secularization of our emotional valuations. What also means the secularization of our concepts of sex and of the universe, and becoming ever more objective. With the secularization of the physical aspects of sex and of the universe, there is the secularization of the psychic aspects of sex, their spiritualized and so becoming the very core of religious postulates, and therefore of religiosity. It is these mental processes of which some more detailed report is hereafter given.

ORIGIN OF PHALIC WORSHIP

Let us begin with some suggestion of the mental processes through which sex worship arose. This will be followed by suggestions as to the process of the secularization of the universe. Afterwards come the process of secularizing the external nature,
