Philosopher Jack:

Philosopher Jack R. M. Ballantyne, 2014-05-29 If the entire circuit of a friend's conversation were comprised in the words Don't and Do it might perhaps be taken for granted that his advice was not of much value nevertheless it is a fact that Philosopher Jack's most intimate and valuable if not valued friend never said anything to him beyond these two words Nor did he ever condescend to reason He listened however with unwearied patience to reasoning but when Jack had finished reasoning and had stated his proposed course of action he merely said to him Don't or Do For what end was I created said the philosopher gloomily Wise and momentous question when seriously put but foolish remark if not worse when flung out in bitterness of soul Jack whose other name was Edwin and his age nineteen was a student Being of an argumentative turn of mind his college companions had dubbed him Philosopher Tall strong active kindly hilarious earnest reckless and impulsive he was a strange compound with a handsome face a brown fluff on either cheek and a moustache like a lady's eyebrow Moreover he was a general favourite yet this favoured youth sitting at his table in his own room sternly repeated the question in varied form and with increased bitterness Why was I born at all
