Artificial Intelligence in Education: a Systematic Review

DOI: 10.2478/9788367405546-084

Abstract

This systematic review presents a comprehensive synthesis of recent scientific findings concerning the disruptive effects of artificial intelligence on the educational sector. In light of the rapid expansion of AI integration in education over the past three years, this study draws upon a sample of 17 scholarly outputs from the post-pandemic era to derive meaningful insights. Although previous studies have shown that AI can generate positive outcomes for both teachers and students, there is a lack of knowledge on how AI is used in the educational process. Hence, this research article aims to investigate not only the benefits and risks emerging from the implementation of AI technologies in education but also the educational level at which AI instruments are mostly integrated into teaching and learning and the characteristics of AI-based models currently used. While few studies have been found on this critical topic, the current references offer up-to-date information on various dimensions of AI systems in education (knowledge, instruments, activities, and consequences). The findings reveal that AI tools have greatly improved students' conceptual understanding related to artificial intelligence, algorithmic thinking, robotics, artificial neural networks, and computer science, as well as the acquisition of other valuable competencies like creativeness, literacy, cooperative research, and emotion control. Finally, future directions for exploring AI in education are presented.

Keywords: artificial intelligence, AI tools, education, educational technology, human-machine.
