Geriatric Care as an Introductory Pharmacy Practice Experience

Joseph A. Woelfel, PhD, Eric Boyce, PharmD, and Rajul A. Patel, PharmD, PhD

Thomas J. Long School of Pharmacy and Health Sciences, University of the Pacific

Objective. To describe the design, delivery, and impact of a geriatric introductory pharmacy practice experience (IPPE) to develop students' skills related to consultant pharmacists' roles and patient care responsibilities.

Design. A required 2-unit geriatric IPPE, involving 40 hours in a geriatric-care facility, 5 reflection hours, and 12 classroom-discussion hours, was developed for first- and second-year pharmacy students. Students interviewed patients and caregivers, reviewed patient charts, triaged patient needs, prepared care plans, and performed quality-assurance functions.

Assessment. After completing the IPPE, students' geriatric- and patient-care abilities were enhanced, based on review of their interactions, care plans, reflections, and examinations, and they demonstrated cognitive, affective, and psychomotor-domain learning skills. Students' care plans and quality assurance activities revealed positive patient outcomes, opportunities for measurable patient health improvement, and a positive impact on quality assurance activities. Student evaluations and feedback from health workers at the facilities also were positive.

Conclusions. This geriatric IPPE in which students cared for a specific patient and interacted with other health care providers is an innovative approach to enhancing students' abilities to serve the growing geriatric population.

INTRODUCTION

As identified in the Institute of Medicine's (IOM) 2008 report, Retooling for an Aging America, the need for pharmacists trained in geriatric care will continue to increase.¹ By the year 2050, the US population age 65 years and older will increase to 88.5 million, more than twice the 2010 population of 40.2 million. Over the same period, the number of people 85 years and older is projected to increase from 5.8 million to 19 million. By 2030, nearly one fifth of US residents will be 65 years of age or older.²

Classroom education in senior care is essential, but effectively applying that knowledge in actual patient care is even more important. Senior care differs from care for younger patients because it involves biological, physiological, pharmacokinetic, and pharmacodynamic factors, along with the functional decline associated with aging. Emphasis on geriatric pharmacotherapy education must grow with the aging population.

A structured approach in the cognitive domain provides the necessary foundation for delivering geriatric care. Learning in the affective domain is fostered through direct student-patient interaction. Student knowledge, comprehension, application, analysis, synthesis, and evaluation are facilitated by active learning and through actual patient interaction. Integration of didactic education with experiential application facilitates student learning across several domains.³⁻⁹

The American Society of Consultant Pharmacists (ASCP) is an international professional society with the mission of promoting the appropriate, safe, and effective use of medications in the elderly. ASCP provides leadership, education, advocacy, and resources to advance the practice of senior care pharmacy by pharmacists as well as pharmacy students. The ASCP Geriatric Pharmacy Curriculum Guide provides assistance on topics for student-centered learning in the classroom setting.¹⁰ Structured learning outside the classroom and in patient-care settings complements and solidifies the didactic education that students receive.^{11,12}
