

10 Modern Philosophers and their Contribution to Education

John Locke and the Tabula Rasa

Locke (1632-1704), an English philosopher and physician, proposed that the mind was a blank slate or tabula rasa. This states that men are born without innate ideas, and that knowledge comes from experience and perception, as opposed to predetermined good and evil nature, as believed by other thinkers.

On his treatise “Some Thoughts Concerning Education”, he emphasized that the knowledge taught during younger years are more influential than those during maturity because they will be the foundations of the human mind. Due to this process of associations of ideas, he stressed out that punishments are unhealthy and educators should teach by examples rather than rules.

This theory on education puts him on a clash with another widely accepted philosophy, backed by another brilliant mind

Immanuel Kant and Idealism

They never lived at the same time, but history always put Locke and Kant on a dust up.

A famed German thinker, Kant (1724–1804) was an advocate of public education and of learning by doing, a process we call training. As he reasons that these are two vastly different things.

He postulated “Above all things, obedience is an essential feature in the character of a child...”. As opposed to Locke, he surmises that children should always obey and learn the virtue of duty, because children's inclination to earn or do something is something unreliable. And transgressions should always be dealt with punishment, thus enforcing obedience.
