Abstract. The main results are presented of a study of the higher education guidance and counselling services in the Member-States of the European Union. The changing context of higher education in Europe, and its implications for guidance and counselling services, are discussed. The main trends in the development of such services are outlined, including the results of a task analysis covering the main guidance and counselling roles. Implications for professionalisation and for training and professional development are reviewed. It is suggested that a European Master's degree could be a valuable complement to national training and qualification structures.

Introduction

In this paper we present the results of a study we have recently carried out which has compared and contrasted the guidance and counselling services in higher education in the 15 Member-States of the European Union. The study has been carried out under the auspices of FEDORA; a professional association established in 1988 for those involved in all aspects of student guidance in Europe. The project has been funded by the European Commission as part of its LEONARDO DA VINCI programme.

The original motivation for the study was the idea, which emerged from FEDORA Summer Schools, of developing a European Master's degree in guidance and counselling in higher education. The final part of our paper will report on the progress of this idea. FEDORA took the view that an essential basepoint for planning such a Master's degree would be an authoritative study of the guidance and counselling services within each Member-State: the structure of the services, the key roles and the tasks performed within these roles, and the nature of the training and qualifications already available for guidance and counselling staff. The paper outlines the methodology used in the study, and reports some of our main findings.
