to define how the rules of access to clinical trial data should be designed to reconcile the policy objectives of leveraging the research potential of data through secondary analysis on the one hand and protecting economic incentives of research based drug companies on the other hand Overall it is argued that the mainstream innovation based justification for exclusive control over the outcomes of research and development can hardly rationalise trial sponsors control over primary data from trials Instead access to such data and its robust analysis should be prioritised Show Me Microsoft Office Access 2003
