BELLINGER, D., A. LEVITON, H. L. NEEDLEMAN, C. WATERNAUX AND M. RABINOWITZ. Low level lead exposure and infant development in the first year. NEUROBEHAVIORAL TOXICOL TERATOL 8(2): 151-161, 1986. The developmental impact of prenatal and early postnatal low-level lead exposure was assessed in a prospective study of 249 middle and upper-middle class infants with umbilical cord blood lead levels in the range currently considered "normal." Infants were classified into three exposure groups: "low" ($<3 \mu\text{g/dl}$), "mid" (6 to 7 $\mu\text{g/dl}$), and "high" ($>10 \mu\text{g/dl}$). At 6 and 12 months, the lead concentration of capillary blood was measured, and the Bayley Scales of Infant Development administered. At both ages, Mental Development Index scores, adjusted for confounding, were inversely related to infants' umbilical cord blood lead levels. The difference between the mean adjusted scores of the infants in the low and high cord blood lead groups was 5.8 points at 6 months and 7.3 points at 12 months. At neither age were scores significantly related to postnatal blood lead levels. Prenatal exposure to lead levels relatively common among urban populations appear to be associated with less favorable development through the first year of life.

Prenatal and postnatal lead studies

Infant development

WE previously reported an inverse relationship between infants' umbilical cord blood lead concentrations and their scores at 6 months of age on the Mental Development Index (MDI) of the Bayley Scales of Infant Development [2,3]. This relationship was dose-dependent over 0 to 25 $\mu\text{g/dl}$, the range of lead levels observed in our sample. The difference between the adjusted MDI scores of the infants in the "low" ($<3 \mu\text{g/dl}$) and "high" ($\geq 10 \mu\text{g/dl}$) exposure groups was approximately 6 points (0.4 SD).

Although this finding suggests that lead has adverse effects at blood concentrations prevalent among young children [12], its implications for regulatory policy depend on the magnitude of the association and its stability over time. Among the relevant questions are the following. Do the performance differences between exposure groups persist beyond 6 months of age? Does the lower mean performance of infants with "high" cord blood lead levels reflect the enhanced susceptibility of a subgroup of these infants or does the effect extend to most of them? Does level of postnatal exposure alter the relationship between cord blood lead concentration and MDI? In this report we address these and related issues by including follow-up assessments of the infants at age 12 months in a re-examination of the association between pre- and postnatal lead exposure and performance on the Bayley Scales in the first year of life.

Sample Selection

The infants enrolled in this study were selected from a Population of 11,837 infants whose umbilical cord blood lead concentration was measured. These infants represent approximately 97% of the births at the Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston, MA, between April 1979 and April 1981. The mean cord blood lead level of this population was 6.6 $\mu\text{g/dl}$ (SD=3.2, range=0-37) (16).

Our goal was to select three groups of infants for study: those with cord blood lead levels in the lowest tenth percentile for the population of births at this hospital (the "low" lead group), those with levels very close to the mean (the "mid" lead group), and those with levels exceeding the ninetieth percentile (the "high" lead group). The distribution of cord blood lead levels for the approximately 2,500 infants born in the first 4.5 months of blood sample collections was used to establish criteria for eligibility in these three groups (<3.6 to 7, and $\geq 10 \mu\text{g/dl}$ for the low, mid, and high lead groups, respectively). The study sample was chosen from the 9,489 infants born between August 10, 1979 and April 30, 1981.

Not all eligible infants and families were invited to participate. Infants were excluded because of a serious medical condition evident at birth or in the early postnatal period (e.g. Down's syndrome, gestational age less than 34 weeks, cleft palate), location of residence (greater than 12 miles from the Children's Hospital or in an area judged unsafe for home visitors), language barrier, failure to seek or obtain consent, an intention to relocate out of the immediate region, or our inability to locate them (Table I). Additional details about the sample selection process and ascertainment bias are presented elsewhere [3].

Low Level Lead Exposure Herbert L. Needleman, 1980 Environmental Health Perspectives, 1995 Human Lead Exposure Herbert L. Needleman, 1991-12-07 Human Lead Exposure consists of scientific reviews and important contributions intended to increase the understanding of the legal social and economic forces that have delayed effective prevention of lead toxicity Chapters discuss the history both ancient and recent of lead explore its neurobiology and toxicology review the sources and routes to humans and examine evidence that indicates that lead may affect humans at levels previously thought to be harmless Neurobiologists epidemiologists public health officials and others concerned about the effects of lead on the human population will find a tremendous amount of useful information in this timely volume The Vulnerable Brain and Environmental Risks R.L. Winder, 2012-12-06 Over the past two millennia environmental lead levels have risen dramatically Patterson 1980 Most of this increase has occurred since the beginning of the present century Murozami et al 1969 and taken into perspective a typical individual living in the industrialized world sustains a lead burden 500 times that of his prehistoric ancestors Patterson 1983 Lead is unique in being an environmental pollutant where the levels deemed clinically toxic are less than an order of magnitude from those that are normally encountered in the population The clinical limit for lead exposure 70 µg Pb / 100 ml blood is about three times the normal value in the range 15-30 µg Pb / 100ml blood This small difference is remarkable from the toxicological standpoint The key concept here is control of dispersal The industrial actions of man bring contact with a wide variety of substances some of which are poisonous or dangerous In such cases protective measures are taken to keep hazardous exposure to a minimum In the case of lead compounds stringent regulations are production and distribution enforced The exception to this is in the dispersal of lead from vehicle

exhausts following purchase from the petrol pump Perhaps man's long standing acquaintance with lead in home and industry is responsible for a complacency which until only recently has been unquestioned Beginning in the late 1960s evidence began to accumulate suggesting that lead at relatively low levels of exposure might be causing negative effects on neurobiological function

Changing Metal Cycles and Human Health J.O. Nriagu, 2012-12-06 of metal interactions with subcellular biochemical systems usually either are metabolites of the system affected porphyrinurias or represent some specific function of a cellular system being impaired proteinurias One typically finds a continuum of symptoms from the subtle or so called no effect biochemical and physiological indicators of exposure to severe clinical disease and death This continuum is the basis of much of the controversy since many health officials follow the traditional practice of applying the threshold health effect concept in evaluating the problems of environmental exposure to metals The past decade or so however has seen a vast increase in our understanding of the effects of elevated concentrations of toxic metals in local populations and ecosystems At the same time there is a growing awareness that the effects of the metals which occur naturally in the environment must be distinguished from those imposed by the pollutant fraction This point was amply documented in a recent study of cadmium intake and cadmium in a number of human tissues in Sweden Japan and the United States which showed fairly conclusively that the background exposure in Japan was about threefold higher than in the other two countries 2 One immediate implication is that any health effect studies of cadmium in Japan using control groups within that country are liable to underestimate the difference between the exposed and the control groups simply because of the high background intake
