POSTDEVELOPMENT ALTERNATIVES
IN THE NORTH*Daniel Bendix, Franziska Müller, and Aram Ziai*

The discourse of 'development' is based on the dualism of 'developed' and 'underdeveloped' societies and the technique of focusing on aspects of the latter, which do not correspond to the norms of the former. In this perspective, 'development' consists of universalizing the Western models of the economy, politics, and knowledge. Postdevelopment questions this approach and looks for alternatives to these models of liberal capitalism, the nation-state and representative democracy, and science – often in social movements and communities in the South that revive other worldviews and practices (see Sachs 2010 and Ziai 2015 for the debate).

However, designating these models as 'Western' neglects that they have become hegemonic in the West only through conflictive historical processes – and that they remain contested. As researchers and postdevelopment activists located in the North, we therefore would like to shift our gaze towards the alternatives to 'development' that can be found here, instead of pointing to examples of vernacular societies in the South, from which we can learn, but which can hardly serve as models for social change in the North. In the allegedly 'developed' societies, the war against subsistence and privatization of the commons for the most part took place quite a while ago, but pockets of resistance can nonetheless be found, and especially in times of crisis still provide a vivid repertoire for autonomy and self-organization, as the examples of Greece and Argentina in the aftermath of socio-economic crisis show.

It is in this light that postdevelopment in the North has to address the North's imperial mode of living in its attempt at social change (Bendix 2017). As our aim is to consider alternatives to the hegemonic and imperial models, we focus on three elementary aspects that form part and parcel of any livelihood: food systems, housing, and energy supply. One example for the first aspect is 'Solidarische Landwirtschaft' ('agriculture of solidarity'), i.e., groups engaged in
