new ideas or the means to clarify sculptural issues, others are drawings after completed sculptures. While knowing which category a specific drawing falls into will add to one's understanding of it, such information about its function hardly dominates the viewing. One of the most remarkable features about these drawings is their ability to signal aim by strictly visual means alone. A group of ink drawings on graph paper from the late '60s, among which is Shuffle-Shirts, Shirts, Shirts, 1968, conveys a striking sense of purpose, due mainly to the articulation and rhythmic distribution of complex geometric structures and basic shapes.

Ingresses Indicated, Segments Enclosed, 1974, an ink drawing on green paper, is similarly evocative, yet here Le Va's analytical geometry yields unexpectedly poetic dividends. His ability to activate the surface of the paper through the strategic yet seemingly random placement of marks lets the image breathe, and thus the mood of the drawing is one of expansiveness. With their strictly balanced, layered structures, primary colors, and elements of collage, Le Va's drawings of the late '70s have a clear-cut constructivist look to them, at the same time, the formal vocabulary of the sculptures and installations described in the drawings has increased in complexity in those drawings that employ tracing paper—for example, Cover Sections Of 2 Triangular Boundaries, Moving Overhead From Ceiling, . . . 1978—the translucent surface of the sheets becomes an evocative white veil that lends a ghostly impression of transparency.

In Le Va's most recent works on paper a shift in focus from the structural description of areas to the rendering of forms in space mirrors the changes occurring in his sculpture. Called "diagrammatic silhouettes," these drawings feature collaged elliptical and circular forms. According to the artist, by using collage he avoids the necessity of repeatedly drawing over forms in order to investigate three-dimensional spatial relationships. Recalling the early 20th-century interest in the art of the machine, these large-scale compositions, with their structural network of solid forms and metallic colors, represent a fascinating meeting point of the graphic and sculptural impulses in modern art, which Le Va will likely continue to pioneer.

"Modern Redux: Critical Alternatives for Architecture in the Next Decade"

Grey Art Gallery and Study Center

"Modern Redux" was perplexing. Its inception was greeted with considerable interest and enthusiasm in the architecture community, but its realization was, finally, a disappointment. The premise of this exhibition was a condemnation of Postmodern architecture—not as envisioned by Robert Venturi in 1966 in his Complexity and Contradiction in Architecture, but as enacted by mediocre practitioners in the past twenty years—and a presentation of evidence for the reemergence of a Modern idiom in contemporary architectural theory and practice. The curator, Douglas Davis, had an exciting idea, but it was so cautiously developed and presented that it evaporated moments after condemnation. This was a difficult starting place for mounting an opposition to the catholicity of current architectural practice. In his fear of becoming an oxymoron as the curatorial, Davis sacrificed clarity and verve.

To reinforce the indivisible but often incompatible marriage of word and deed, the exhibition included well-measured excerpts from modern texts by theorists and practitioners ranging from Jürgen Habermas to Zaha Hadid, as well as two showcases of architectural books and journals (a precise presentation that gave these documents a purely exhibited look). Adjacent to the vitrines was a lineup of chairs and furniture by Steven Hall, Mario Botta, Mark Mack, and Joe d'Urso (Processionals of chairs seem to be quite the rage this year.) Adding to the flea market quality of the installation were Michael McDonough's Semaphores, 1986, lidded Formica dividers that were intentionally poetic if oddly elegant.

The selection of projects (Constructed and uncalced) was an intentional stronghold representing the moments of neo-Modernism: integrity of materials, structural clarity and the revelation of construction methodology, contextual significance, and a sense of the present. In the curator's commendable attempt to evade the limiting layers of classification, the exhibition became more like a round-up than an incisive, polemical event. It all felt like a missed opportunity, but still, the show's importance should not be overlooked. It was democratic in scope and intentions and made a strong case for a future invested without slavish preoccupation with precedent. The failure of Postmodernism is not that it is an architecture of choice or a public art (it is neither of these) but that it has not been an exploration of options carried forward by curious minds. It is simply the most inept kind of orthodoxy. Hangers-on with the most superficial grasp of Venturi's radicalism have created a lot of reactionary architecture that rivals the worst of the International Style. Unfortunately these and other important messages were muffled by the curator's fair-minded, oppositional intent. In this instance, inclusiveness led to incoherence.

Dorothea Rockburne Kavir Fourcode

The custom of terming the altered focus of an artist's recent output a "new body" (of work) serves as an exceptionally apt description for the latest developments in Dorothea Rockburne's shaped canvases. The interested audience of these outwardly geometric compositions, their robust swaths of overlaid lines and their layered angles, catalyze a newly expressionistic physicality within her highly cerebral oeuvre that could easily bedazzle one into focusing on their formal novelty. They assimilate the emotional immediacy of the recent abstract angst yet provide a timely bridge to the revived interest in a cooler abstraction. But to look beneath the work's as covens appearance is to perceive a newly visceral presence with affinities to a more fundamental source of expressionist imagery: that of the human body.
