

committee strongly believes that creative writing or other artistic activity contributes to the development of the teacher of modern literature, if only by giving him insight into the creative process. A reasonable amount of creative work (the amount to be approved by the student's advisory committee) may be counted among the 72 units required. Students specializing in modern English and American literature must demonstrate a reading knowledge of one foreign language comparable to that required by the Department of English, and an advanced reading knowledge of one other foreign language. The language requirements for students specializing in a foreign literature are to be determined by the appropriate advisory committees.

A full assessment will be made of progress both in the modern literature of specialization and in the chosen areas of interdisciplinary work. This assessment may take the form of written or oral examinations, a series of monographs covering the work done, or, for certain areas, public lectures and discussions. The university oral examination will normally be taken in the third year of graduate study, and will cover the field of intensive concentration (as defined by the student and his advisory committee) and the plans for the dissertation. The dissertation may be drawn from the literature of specialization, from some area of non-literary thought or activity, or from some combination of the two.

Normally students on teaching fellowships will be available for teaching in the appropriate departments, as needed, and for teaching in Freshman Seminars or in such undergraduate interdisciplinary programs as may develop.
