Modernism, Modernization and Europeanization in West African Architecture, 1944–94

*William Whyte

In 1944 the architect and author Edwin Maxwell Fry sailed to West Africa where he had been appointed town-planning adviser to the British Governor. A few months later his wife and partner, Jane Drew, joined him. Over the next decade they were to design a series of high-profile and highly important projects. They planned new towns and villages, built the University of Ibadan and the National Museum of Ghana, reshaped the nature of Nigerian and Ghanaian architecture, and wrote a series of influential essays and books on tropical building.¹ Arriving in West Africa, Fry claimed to have found no building industry; 'Nor was there any architecture worthy of the name, nor any background of architecture'.² The situation, Fry and Drew concluded, resembled 'that of architecture in the dark ages in Europe'.³ 'Traditional African building', they argued, was 'unsuitable for the development of a modern civilization'.⁴ What was needed was a 'European importation' – and, more specifically, the adoption of European modernist architecture, albeit moderated by the demands of the local climate and customs. This was far from unique; in fact, it was just one part of a wider movement of modernism which found its expression in many other projects.⁵ Nonetheless, it is a particularly striking example of an attempt at the self-conscious Europeanization of architecture: the deliberate imposition of 'European' ideas and aesthetics on an African colony.⁶

More strikingly still, however, this ostensibly Europeanized architecture – and the argument that justified it – survived decolonization. Indeed, it can be argued that Nigeria and Ghana, in particular, turned with an ever-increasing enthusiasm to modernist architecture after independence; ironically ensuring that the removal of European political power was memorialized by European architecture.⁷ As the architectural historian Henry-Russell Hitchcock put it in 1977: 'while the west was more and more losing political control of Africa and Asia, its cultural influence on those continents did not necessarily decline, indeed as regards architecture it probably increased.'⁸ Although Fry and Drew's work became outmoded,
