

Policies, Politics and the Future of Lifelong Learning

Ann Hodgson

Policies, Politics and the Future of Lifelong Learning takes stock of how the concept of lifelong learning has developed and how it has affected current policy debates. It makes sense of approaches to lifelong learning in Europe and the UK, and offers a rigorous assessment of policies and future opportunities.

Lifelong learning as a concept began to take real shape in the latter part of the 20th century, developing as an issue not only for educators and learners, but also as a central part of political debate. With social inclusion, key skills and employment, plus more general personal concerns such as literacy, still at the fore of contemporary economic, educational and social policy, the lifelong learning debate has become increasingly important.

With insightful contributions from a wide range of leading authors, the book analyses a number of current debates about lifelong-learning policy. The book challenges some of the prevailing policy assumptions about lifelong learning, in particular its current narrow focus on aspects of post-16 education. It ends by suggesting that lifelong learning policy in the UK needs to move firmly in the direction of a more genuine cradle-to-grave concept. The book will be powerful and stimulating reading for all those concerned with the present and future of post-16 education.

The Editor

Ann Hodgson is a senior lecturer in the Institute of Education's Lifelong Learning Group, University of London. Together with Ken Spours, she edited Dearing and Beyond (Kogan Page, 1997) and co-authored New Labour's Educational Agenda (Kogan Page, 1999).

The Future of Education from 14+ series provides a focus for analysis of the present and future shape of education and training, linking research, policy and practice in full-time education (14–19), work-based learning and lifelong learning.

The Series Editors

Ken Spours co-edits the series along with Ann Hodgson. He is also Senior Lecturer in the Institute of Education's Lifelong Learning Group, University of London.
