Competing Trade Agendas in the Arab-Israeli Peace Process J.W. Wright, Jr.,1998-08-18 Most analyses of the Arab Israeli peace process and the negotiations that surround it have been political Given that the most public players in the process have been politicians and that the most active writers on the subject are political scientists this is not surprising This analysis challenges the notion that politicians drive the negotiations Using theoretical underpinnings drawn from work written by a diverse group of economists this paper investigates the roles that competing trade agendas have in the Arab Israeli peace process Moreover it endeavors to paint a portrait of a process that is directed by people who control distributive policies and who regulate the influence of money in both economics and politics Such a view identifies the financial and fiscal interests of individuals corporations politicians and political parties as the driving forces behind the Arab Israeli negotiations as opposed to identifying leaders with real ambitions for building sustainable peace in the region It further asserts that Israel s core conglomerates and their powerful American and European partners are skeptical of the gains to be made from retooling their war oriented systems into production structures which can effectively compete in a peacetime economy

Economic and Political Impediments to Middle East Peace L. Drake, 1999-11-09 The accords and protocols that underlie the Arab and Israeli peace agreements set into place economic policies and political processes so flawed that they are bound to fail The chapters in this volume look at the diplomatic and historical precedents that have led to this situation and they debate some cynically and some sympathetically the reasons why the institutional structures and trade regimes the process has created are so weak But for whatever reason the structural flaws built into the Middle East peace process are not only biased toward the dominant players but against the people who most want peace
