Singapore's Foreign Policy: Coping with Vulnerability

Michael Leifer

London, Routledge, 2000, 177 pp.

The rise of Singapore from a mere trading post to a society with one of the highest living standards in the world in just three decades has generated keen international interest. Many economists have attempted to identify and analyse the factors that have contributed to Singapore's successful transformation, but few commentators have touched on its foreign policy and diplomacy in this context. Leifer argues that antagonism towards Singapore in Malaysia and Indonesia has been its 'primary political fear', and that political unpredictability in both countries has an adversarial impact on Singapore's foreign policy approaches. Leifer thus insists that the principal objective of Singapore's foreign policy is to cope with this innate vulnerability.

Leifer stresses that Singapore's primary means of coping with this vulnerability has been to conduct diplomacy on a balance-of-power basis, which, in Singapore's case, aims to 'deny a hegemonic position on the part of states judged likely to harm the interests of the Republic' (p. 9). In this sense, 'the multiple involvement within the regional locale of important extra-regional states, especially the United States, has been encouraged as a practical way of coping with vulnerability and complementing a national defence capability' (p. 26). Therefore, Leifer regards even Singapore's 'exceptionalism in its
