

Mitochondrial uncoupling proteins and obesity: Molecular and genetic aspects of UCP1

Genetic variation in brown fat specific mitochondrial uncoupling protein-1 (UCP1) expression and brown adipocyte morphology, have provided models to test the hypothesis that nonshivering thermogenesis is associated with the regulation of body weight. Genetic manipulation using transgenic animals and gene targeting, has resulted in mice with an over-expression of UCP1. These variant animals consistently show that over-expression of UCP1 reduced adiposity. On the other hand, less agreement is found in models that reduce nonshivering thermogenesis. Inactivation of the UCP1 gene, by gene targeting, does not increase adiposity when compared to control animals; however, a mouse expressing the UCP1-DTA transgene (UCP1-diphtheria toxin A chain), in which there is a modest reduction in the number of brown adipocytes, becomes obese. Other phenotypes of this mouse, the hyperphagia, extreme resistance to leptin administration, retinopathy and high residual content of brown adipocytes, suggest that the effects of the transgene may be more extensive than simply a 60% reduction in the number of brown adipocytes. Ectopic expression of UCP1-DTA in the brain could explain the phenotype of this mouse in a manner more consistent with the results of other models with altered UCP1 and brown adipocyte expression.

Introduction

Experimental manipulations of brown adipose tissue (BAT) with genetic and pharmacological techniques in several animal models, have provided strong evidence that an increase in nonshivering thermogenesis is an effective mechanism for the regulation of body weight. Reductions in the capacity for thermogenesis, generally lead to increased adiposity, while an increased thermogenic capacity reduces adiposity. Although the experimental evidence from these studies strongly support a role for the brown fat specific mitochondrial uncoupling protein (UCP1) as the principle thermogenic mechanism causing a change in adiposity, it is possible that some of the effects are due to other thermogenic mechanisms. Of particular interest is the need to evaluate the role the other members in the UCP family of genes the thermogenic processes involved in the regulation of body weight.<sup>1-5</sup> For example, mice in which the Ucp1 gene has been inactivated by gene targeting, are sensitive to cold, but they are not more obese than the control mice that have a fully functioning Ucp1 gene.<sup>6</sup> Since the UCP1-deficient mice have elevated levels of UCP2 mRNA, it has been suggested that UCP2 compensates for the loss of UCP1 in maintaining a normal body weight.<sup>6</sup> However, if UCP2 is able to compensate for UCP1 in regulating body weight, then why does it not compensate for Ucp1 deficiency in protecting mice from acute exposure to cold? Our ability to detect these relationships is dependent on several parameters, including genetic background, gender and age. Of particular importance is the genetic background of the animal, since this can influence the development of obesity by variant genes that are independent of nonshivering thermogenesis. The interaction of other variant genes can affect thermogenesis and have a large impact on the response of the animal to beta adrenergic agonists. It is important to emphasize that for a genetically defined model of obesity like diet-induced obesity of the A/J and C57BL/6J inbred strains,<sup>7</sup> the susceptibility to obesity is almost certainly the consequence of the interactions of several sub-phenotypes and each of these sub-phenotypes will be determined by several genes. Given our focused agenda, we will discuss only the genetic variation associated with UCP1.

Knockout and transgenic models

We would like to review the genetic evidence that elevated UCP1 concentrations increase energy expenditure, with a resulting reduction in adiposity and, conversely, that reduced UCP1 leads to increased adiposity. The first genetic study to address this
