At first glance, Sahar Tawfiq's short stories may seem reminiscent of works by a string of contemporary Egyptian feminist writers—such as Nawal El Saadawi, Alifa Rifaat, and Salwa Bakr—who have experimented with the short story genre to broach feminist issues in modern Arab society. Yet although Tawfiq may share much of her vision with these established feminist authors, her literary style is entirely her own. In an innovative and perhaps unprecedented move in modern Egyptian literature, Tawfiq chooses to utilize Egyptian folklore and tales dating back to Pharaonic times in order to examine the rapidly changing position of women in contemporary Egyptian society. As such, her works question the place of long-powerful myths and beliefs in modern Arab society and the ways in which such myths have contributed to the oppression of Egyptian women through the ages.

Although most of the eight short stories in this collection seem to recall ancient literary traditions, sayings, and beliefs at various points in the narrative, the process is employed most effectively in the story "Points of the Compass," the most powerful work in the present volume. Divided into four sections—Westward, Southward, Northward, Eastward—the story is a series of embedded and overlapping narratives by speakers and interlocutors who are never defined or clearly introduced, ranging from Mufida and her poet, to a dialogue between a mother and her daughter, to tales and traditions recounted by an elderly man by the name of Amm Ali.

In spite of the deliberate ambiguity and seemingly incoherent nature of the many voices that comprise this story, there is one primary constant which unifies the work and is itself as timeless and as layered as the story's narrative structure: the Nile, Egypt's "sacred river" (46), whose endless flow serves as a metaphor for constant renewal by functioning as the basis for a reexamination of historical elements that have been generally shunned, ignored, and censored by traditional historians. Because many of the old myths, figures, and traditions that are sporadically recalled in the narrative are left unexplained by the author, the translator has inserted several footnotes which render the text more accessible to readers unfamiliar with ancient Egyptian folklore.

Not unlike "Points of the Compass," the other seven stories in this collection also include several narrative levels. In "That the Sun May Sink," Tawfiq employs the stream-of-consciousness technique to point to the two paradoxical voices emanating from the main character. As the story develops, the reader is quickly made aware of the contradictions that govern the narrator's life, as demonstrated by the opposition between what she says and what she thinks. In
