

Reassessing the “Nuclear Winter” Theory: Current Research on the Climate Effects of Nuclear War and Its Implications for Security and Nuclear Deterrence*

ICHIMASA Sukeyuki

Abstract

This paper attempts to re-evaluate scholarly research since the 1980s on the climate effects of nuclear war from a security perspective. The “nuclear winter” theory is epitomized by the work of the TTAPS team, comprised of Richard Turco, Carl Sagan, and others. It warned that the dust and smoke generated by a nuclear attack on an urban area could rise to and linger in the stratosphere, cause a significant drop in surface temperatures and block sunlight, leading to prolonged global cooling. While the study is credited with contributing to ending the nuclear arms race, it also became a target of widespread criticism due to its political impact. Following the end of the Cold War, attention to nuclear winter declined with reductions in nuclear arsenals. Since the second half of the 2000s, however, studies on the theory have evolved with advances in climate modeling, with many published papers showing that even a limited nuclear war would have severe climate and food production consequences. A subject of much academic debate, increasingly sophisticated research methods are being used to consider the nuclear winter theory, which still has important implications for international security and nuclear deterrence. At this juncture, it is incumbent on all nuclear weapon states to scientifically reassess the theory in light of their nuclear war plans and reconsider their approaches to nuclear risks.

Introduction

It is known that nuclear explosions produce physical phenomena, such as heat rays and blasts, shock waves, radioactivity, and electromagnetic pulses. However, a definitive opinion is still lacking regarding the medium- and long-term environmental and climatic consequences of nuclear war. While receiving minimal media attention,¹ analysis conducted in the 1970s of nuclear war’s environmental impacts, particularly ozone depletion, initiated subsequent studies on the climate effects of nuclear war.² In the early 1980s, the “nuclear winter” hypothesis (“nuclear winter” theory) stimulated a prolific debate in academic journals. This theory posits that the dust and smoke generated by a nuclear attack on an urban area could rise to and linger in the stratosphere,
