Erin B. Jensen, University of Utah

INTRODUCTORY ESSAY

Writing in the Social Sciences is an undergraduate upper division writing course required for social science majors (including anthropology, sociology, and psychology), and the course also fulfills the upper division writing requirement for the university. While the majority of students enrolled in the class are social science majors, students with other majors including computer science, economics, education, health sciences, and business take the course as well. The writing class is taught every semester and is offered as either an online or a classroom-based course. The following syllabus is for the online version of the course.

This version of the course is influenced by my experiences helping social science majors in the University Writing Center with their writing and with applications for graduate school. The course introduces upper division students to undergraduate publication opportunities, research-focused essays, and graduate school applications and materials.

The benefits of undergraduate research and publishing are well documented, as the benefits include helping students gain confidence in their writing, providing them an opportunity to establish a mentor relationship with professors, and helping them to apply for graduate school and financial aid (Abdul-Alim, 2012; Berry, 2016; Burns & Ware, 2008; Matten & Teitge, 2003). Burns and Ware (2008) provide a literature review on the benefits of undergraduate research and publication and identify six reasons for undergraduate publication: it helps students develop critical thinking skills, participate in collaborative learning, refine communication skills, become enthusiastic about scholarly pursuits, become familiar with the research process, and develop better writing skills (p. 255). Burns and Ware (2008) argue that having students write for a specific journal increases students' writing ability and skills because they know there is a purpose behind the writing assignment (p. 255).

Undergraduate publishing can also lead to successful graduate school applications and increased financial help. Abdul-Alim (2012) relates the experience of an undergraduate co-authoring a paper based on her experiences studying plants and then receiving a $100,000 scholarship to attend graduate school. While this may be an extreme example, undergraduate students appreciate knowing that undergraduate publication can be financially beneficial. Mark Kantrowitz, a publisher with fastweb.com, emphasizes that students should certainly "mention being published as an undergraduate, because people who have been published as an undergraduate are seen as having a lot of promise as a future researcher" (cited in Abul-Alim).

During the course, students read articles about the benefits of undergraduate publishing to help them better understand the course's focus on such publishing. It is important for students to understand why the course is focused on undergraduate research and why such research could be beneficial to them. Course feedback has established that the majority of students enrolled in the course are unaware of the possibilities of undergraduate publications and that there should be an increased awareness among social science majors of the benefits of undergraduate research and publishing.
