Comparative Criminology and Comparative Criminal Justice in Contemporary Crime and Social Control Research – a Brief Overview

1 Introduction

When I first started thinking about this editorial, I reflected on my criminological career, which started in the 1990s. Most of my criminological research has been comparative, at least to some extent, and this piece is about comparative research and the encouragement of younger researchers to be ambitious and brave to make this kind of effort. Learning about other cultures, systems, policies, and practices can enrich researchers and contribute to developing criminological thought and practice. It also helps to prevent geocentrism and short-sightedness and broadens perspectives. For most of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, comparative criminology was pushed aside due to the closure of countries in solving their internal social and other problems and the unwillingness to share information about criminality in the international environment (Howard and Newman, 2001).

The world is shrinking and never before have researchers been more closely connected than now. The covid-19 pandemic and the changing nature of deviance, crime and social control have contributed to new research activities, not only nationally and regionally but also globally (for example, Nivette, et al., 2021; Nogala, et al., 2021). I attended many conferences and project meetings before the covid-19 pandemic, but stay-at-home measures intensified research activities and international online conferencing. I sometimes attended three international meetings in one day, organized by researchers from different continents during the covid-19 pandemic. Now we are getting to a “new normality” and it looks like we going back to old routines, but that will never happen
