THE PENETRATION OF CAPITALISM
IN A SOUTH INDIAN DISTRICT
*The First 60 Years of Colonial
Rule in Tiruchirapalli*

P. B. MAYER

The question of the mode of production in Indian agriculture is one which has drawn considerable attention in recent years.¹ The contributors to that debate have considered issues such as the persistence in contemporary rural India of "quasi-feudal" social relationships, the presence or absence of unattached agrarian labour, the existence of tenancy and share-cropping and the degree to which capital has been used to raise the productivity of labour. Despite an amorphous consensus on the nature and sequence of the changes which have occurred in Indian agriculture, there is almost no agreement on such fundamental questions as how Indian agriculture is to be classified, as semi-feudal or capitalist; whether the period of colonialism saw the introduction of "generalized commodity production" into agriculture, or whether agriculture remained in a separate sphere, contained within an older mode of production. One of the most interesting of the recent contributions to the debate suggests that the only unambiguous criterion amongst all these is the emergence of generalized commodity production and that, although there is agreement that it did emerge, no-one has yet identified the point of demarcation, or even been able to specify how such a point might be identified.²

This significant debate has apparently lost its forward momentum, which is regrettable, for it is potentially an extraordinarily fruitful line of enquiry. There seem to be a number of reasons why this has occurred, but at the root of all of them is the high theoretical level at which the argument has been conducted. As is so often the case, there has been little or no attempt to utilize the theoretical concepts in the study of concrete historical contexts and thus little work either to make the concepts operational or to test them against the complexities of events. Equally, the debate has been erected upon a number of major assumptions, which themselves need to be subjected to question.

Corporate Power and Canadian Capitalism William K. Carroll,2011-11-01 Challenging standard dependency theory William Carroll argues from empirical evidence that Canada s financial industrial elite have maintained and consolidated their competitive position at the centre of an inter corporate network Corporate Power and Canadian Capitalism thus acknowledges the unusually high degree to which capital is concentrated in a relatively few giant corporations in Canada but it denies that these commercial interests are subordinated to American corporate capital To test the validity of this new perspective on the transformation of indigenous capitalists into a national bourgeoisie Carroll traces the accumulation of capital in the largest Canadian corporations and the institutional relations that have existed among the same firms since World War II Instead of selling out to foreign capital Canadian firms have in fact become increasingly interlocked and Canadian controlled firms have been and continue to be the focus of both the industrial and financial sectors with foreign controlled companies occupying decidedly peripheral positions From this interpretative position Canada s development is seen as markedly similar to that of other advanced capitalist countries culminating in consolidation of control under an elite accompanied both by penetration of foreign economies by domestic financial capitalists and a concomitant penetration of the domestic economy by foreign capital Places Through the Body Heidi Nast,Steve Pile,2005-08-12 This exciting collection from a leading team of international contributors interprets the symbolic and material relationships between places and bodies
