

Chapter 1

Getting Acquainted With Latin America

Visiting a Neighbor Boy

José Sánchez lives with his parents, three brothers, and two sisters near the edge of a small Mexican village. The main road through José's village is paved, but the side streets are dirt or gravel. At the edge of town, a speed bump called a tope (tō' pā) gives a bouncing welcome to everyone who comes into the village.

José's house looks much like the several dozen other houses in his village. The walls are made of sun-dried bricks called adobe (ə dō' bē) covered with plaster. Two doorways and several windows let light into the house during the day. José is thankful for the beautiful new tile roof his father put on the house, because their old thatched roof allowed the rain to leak in and made a nesting place for swarms of pesky insects. The red tile roof keeps out all the winter rains. It deflects the heat of summer better than the metal roofs that many of José's neighbors' homes have.

The Sánchezes' small house has four rooms. In the hot summer months, the family often entertains guests outside. When company comes during cool weather, the family visits with their guests inside. The Sánchezes have electricity, though some people who live in mountain villages do not.

Early each morning Mrs. Sánchez and many other village women busily
