Notations for a
Participatory Environment

Philip Thiel

Philip Thiel believes that environmental design and research should be based on the shared experience of the users in the context of their environment through the environment. The idea is that design should be primarily concerned with the self-identified and clearly specified needs and preferences of the users. The process is a progressive inquiry to the facts, past or present, in the development of new ideas and procedures necessary for the implementation of this approach in environmental design and planning research.

Thiel believes a well-oriented participatory process of environmental planning, design, and management is needed for the future. It identifies and profiles the properties, users and flow of the environment. It then creates a representative model of these users as necessary to the formation of "representative participatory organizations" as part of the design process. Design development then proceeds with reference to the experience of these users in order to determine design in the form of integrated environmental responses.

Thiel's research and development are based on a series of studies, including the "Participatory Environment" study, which is a series of studies on the "Participatory Environment" study, which is a series of studies on the "Participatory Environment" study.
