

Cases and Commentaries

The Journal of Mass Media Ethics publishes case studies in which scholars and media professionals outline how they would address a particular ethical problem. Some cases are purely hypothetical, but most are from actual experience in newsrooms, corporations, and other agencies.

We invite readers to call our attention to current cases and issues. (There is a special need for good cases in advertising and public relations.) We also invite suggestions of names of people, both professionals and academicians, who might write commentaries. Tom Cooper, professor of Visual and Media Arts at Emerson College, wrote the following case.

Marketing New Software and Choreographing Intelligent Agents

Stan McGregor is confused. As senior research engineer for a major telecommunication and computer company, he is on the leading edge of developing important new technology called "choreographed intelligent agents." His synthesis of several types of software would allow his company to sell "need-fulfilling" services to clients over the Internet. Stan's invention would, for example, enable a client to tell his computer that he is lonely, and the choreographed intelligent agents would automatically produce a long list of options for the customer to relieve loneliness. Everything from a list of phone numbers of friends and relatives to a list of phone numbers of escort services, on-air psychologists, and lots more would appear on the computer screen all within 1 min.

On the one hand, Stan is happy because he may be on the verge of fame and fortune—if he and his company can only beat their competition to the market. On the other hand, Stan has struggled to identify several ethical issues, which he has listed in a memo to his supervisors. This list includes:
