Ecclesiastical Lordship, Seigneurial Power and the Commercialization of Milling in Medieval England Adam

Lucas, 2016-04-29 This is the first detailed study of the role of the Church in the commercialization of milling in medieval England. Focusing on the period from the late eleventh to the mid sixteenth centuries, it examines the estate management practices of more than thirty English religious houses founded by the Benedictines, Cistercians, Augustinians and other minor orders, with an emphasis on the role played by mills and milling in the establishment and development of a range of different sized episcopal and conventual foundations. Contrary to the views espoused by a number of prominent historians of technology since the 1930s, the book demonstrates that patterns of mill acquisition, innovation and exploitation were shaped not only by the size, wealth and distribution of a house's estates but also by environmental and demographic factors, changing cultural attitudes and legal conventions prevailing, and emergent technical traditions, the personal relations of a house with its patrons, tenants, servants and neighbours, and the entrepreneurial and administrative flair of bishops, abbots, priors and other ecclesiastical officials.

Suffolk in the Middle Ages Norman Scarfe, 2007 Norman Scarfe explores place names, the Sutton Hoo ship burial, the coming of Christianity and the abbey at Bury St Edmunds, concluding with an evocative study of five Suffolk places: Southwold, Dunwich, Yoxford and Wingfield, and Fressingfield. The modern landscape of Suffolk is still essentially a medieval one, though much of it is even earlier: the five hundred medieval churches and ten thousand listed houses of historic or architectural interest and the Hundred lanes going back at least to the tenth century are often found to be set in a landscape created before the Roman conquest. Suffolk in the Middle Ages opens with a discussion of the earliest written records, the place names as a guide to settlement patterns, including the setting of Sutton Hoo. Among the grave goods found in that celebrated ship and discussed here was the whetstone sceptre, asked to carry it from its showcase in the British Museum to the laboratory; the author acknowledges a closer feeling of involvement even than helping to re-open the ship in its mound in 1966. His explanation of the presence of the whetstone sceptre printed here has never been challenged. The identification of a carved Anglo-Saxon cross at Iken in 1977 prompted the essay here on St Botolph and the coming of East Anglian Christianity. This leads to a consideration of the Danish invasion of East Anglia and a re-examination of the posthumous victory of King Edmund and Christianity as portrayed in an imaginary Breckland warren on the front of this book. Scarfe's carefully reasoned argument that the Metropolitan Museum's famous walrus-ivory cross was made for the monks' choir at Bury has never been refuted. Life in Bury Abbey is vividly reconstructed; it was the most richly documented flowering of the work of East Anglia's apostles Felix and Fursa, which also led to the phenomenal establishment in Suffolk by 1086 of four hundred of the five hundred medieval churches. In four East Suffolk essays, Southwold, Dunwich, Yoxford and Wingfield are exposed to Norman Scarfe's interpretative skills. He reveals a past few could have guessed at, often quite as curious as the Two Strange Tales unravelled in his concluding pages.

Naming the People of England, c.1100-1350 Dave Postles, 2020-05-15

Medieval historians have for some time recognized the significance of personal naming processes and patterns for the illumination of social relations such as kinship and spiritual kinship or godparenthood. Increasingly they are employing the investigation of personal naming anthroponymy as part of their elucidation of cultural change, attempting through changes in patterns of personal naming to discern cultural transitions and transformations. Recent coordinated research on the European continent has produced major collaborative discussion of the cultural implications of naming in France, the Iberian peninsula and Italy. The fruits of new research into the Germanic lands have also richly enhanced our understanding of cultural change there. So it is predicated that a new trans-European culture arose in the centuries about and after the year 1000. Omitted from this coordinated understanding of the arrival of a new European cultural tradition as it came to persist is the British archipelago. We are however far from devoid of scholarly examination of the culture of personal naming in the British Isles. An older generation of linguists produced a basic foundation although it has not remained free of some criticism. Subsequently several scholars have independently advanced the interpretive analysis. Clark, Fellows, Jensen, Insley and McClure. At one level then this book attempts a synthesis of that previous highly valuable but diffuse research to make it more widely known, understood and accessible. At another level nonetheless it engages with what has become a prevailing narrative of cultural change in England after the Norman Conquest: the rapid transformation of English naming and culture through the assimilation of a new dominant extraneous influence. By reinserting the detail and complexity it is hoped to demonstrate that far from a single uniform homologous culture there existed residual, even resistant and regional cultures. The account it is hoped presents a cohesive new narrative of the cultural implications of personal naming in England whilst also addressing important issues of gender politics and social organization.
