1. Managing time effectively is the main achievement of both distance and regular students. The proper use of time is necessary for enhancing students' achievement and performance. Every student needs to be knowledgeable in this skill in order to achieve better outcomes. The objective of this research was to apply structural equation modeling to identify the correlation between students' academic success in distance learning and their time management skills. There are four hundred students from Virtual and Allama Iqbal Open Universities in different departments who participated in this study. Respondent's information was gathered using self-created questionnaires on a five-point Likert scale that asked about time management and academic success. When confirming the validity of scales, internal consistency was examined within items using Cronbach's alpha, rho-a, and composite reliability. All three techniques verified that the instruments are valid and reliable. For path analysis, data were thoroughly analyzed. And the result shows that there was a strong relationship between time management and academic achievement ($r = .778$) of distance learning students. In conclusion, both variables are related to one another, and students' learning is significantly impacted by their ability to manage their time. (Saghir et al., 2019)

2. Time management has also been defined as a type of self-management that places a strong focus on knowing what tasks to complete, how to complete them more effectively, and what time is best for the specific task. It has also been linked to lower anxiety levels and higher academic performance in students. The three fundamental aspects of time management behavior are time attitudes, long-range planning, and short-range planning. Time attitude is one's mindset toward the past, present, and future which has been closely associated with academic success. The idea of handling daily tasks over a longer length of time while maintaining goals established for important dates is referred to as competency in long-range planning. Short-range planning, on the other hand, refers to the process of making plans for activities that will take place within a day or week. These time management practices or skills, it is suggested, will help students manage their studies and learn their objectives more effectively. (Alyami et al., 2021)

3. Time management is crucial for academic achievement in general and must be given importance to combat the decline of finishing projects and assignments given the challenges of prioritization and poor time management, wherein students were most likely
