The Adoption of a Theoretical Orientation by Chicago School of Professional Psychology Graduate Students in Clinical Psychology, 1999 Graduate students in clinical psychology at the Chicago School of Professional Psychology N 141 were surveyed regarding their reasons for the selection of their theoretical orientations For the purpose of this study theoretical orientation was defined as the conceptual framework which a therapist uses as his or her guide in treatment formulation and diagnosis selection of techniques strategies and settings and in general relating to the client A short questionnaire was given to the students in the following classes Personality Assessment classes Assessment Practicum Seminars Therapy Practicum Seminars and Advanced Practicum Seminars The questionnaire asked students to rate on a scale from 1 to 5 the degree to which each of 14 variables influenced the selection of their theoretical orientation Some of these variables included clinical experience outcome research graduate training and orientation of clinical supervisors The study found that students at the Chicago School were reluctant to limit themselves to one orientation Many students chose two or even three orientations as their predominant theoretical model For those who did mark just one orientation Eclectic and Psychodynamic Psychoanalytic were the most popular choices The results indicate that theoretical orientation develops over time as seen by the Year in School variable while students with Masters degrees have a head start on their non Masters colleagues A factor analysis of the 14 variables produced four main factors influencing orientation Life Experiences emerged as one of the most influential factors in choosing a theoretical orientation It appears that a student's choice of theoretical orientation is almost predetermined That is variables that are outside of the student's graduate school influence the adoption of theoretical orientation Educating the Reflective Practitioner Donald A. Schon, 1987 Case Studies in Reflective Inquiry Stewart B. Shapiro, 2006-01 Today in the world of short sound bites computer and visual media and technological input from cell phones text messaging and the media in general the emphasis on the human touch so central to shared communication and the exchange of ideas is an endangered species Above all Shapiro's work provides us with the opportunity to learn what it is to actively turn toward others and to think and feel with them in a mutual process of sustained high quality attention characteristic of what he has identified as reflective inquiry
