at hinc frementis verterunt bis mille equos
Galli canentes Caesarem.

This is Keller's text. The MSS. are divided between adhuc, adhun, ad hunc, at huc, and at hunc. Bentley proposed ad hoc, Cunningham at hinc, N. Heinsius ab hoc, Fea at hoc. I think the true reading is at hui! The interjection is especially appropriate since Horace professes to be on shipboard at Actium and watching the battle-array in the highest excitement. Of course hui! occurs chiefly in the comedians and Cicero's letters, but it is by no means a vulgar or wholly comic interjection.

THE ORIGIN OF TRAGEDY, WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO THE GREEK TRAGEDIANS.

The Origin of Tragedy, with special reference to the Greek Tragedians. By WILLIAM RIDGEWAY, Sc.D., F.B.A., etc. Cambridge University Press, 1910.

UNTIL a few years ago, most scholars believed that Attic Tragedy was descended from a sixth-century performance, which might be indifferently called 'dithyramb' or 'satyr-play'—a performance in honour of Dionysus, mainly choral, and presented by men disguised as satyrs or 'goat-men'—(whence τραγῳδία). Into this performance Thespis introduced an actor distinct from the chorus. The date at which tragedy came to be completely differentiated from Satyric drama was assumed to fall with the last few decades of the sixth century. The original Satyric dithyramb was regarded as a Dorian and Peloponnesian rite. The main point of interest in Prof. Ridgeway's work is his attempt to prove that Tragedy was not originally Dionysiac or Satyric, but began in mimetic ritual performed at the tombs of deceased 'heroes,' and that this ritual was only absorbed into that of Dionysus at a comparatively late date. The performances at the hero-tombs were called 'tragic' because the performers dressed themselves in goat-skins—reverting, for ritual purposes, to the common dress of those earlier and simpler days, in which the ritual had originated. The tomb of the hero was either converted into the thymele of Dionysus, or at least the latter took its place beside the former.

The plays of Thespis belonged to hero-ritual, not to Dionysiac, and his great work was to divorce them from the sacred tomb and the annual celebration thereat, and so to create a more independent drama. The prominence in extant tragedies of tombs and lamentations, and the appearance of the ghosts of deceased heroes as characters in the play, is a survival from the original performances at the tombs. The Satyric drama, on the other hand, developed out of genuinely Dionysiac rites of an indecent and riotous kind—not out of Dorian dithyrambs, but out of a Thracian ritual designed to secure fertility.

The discussion of the rival theories turns largely on the interpretation of a number of much disputed passages, on the weighing of analogies drawn from peoples far removed from the Greeks of the Classical Age, and on the possibility of explaining the particular features in extant tragedies, which it is sought to explain, upon the older theory no less satisfactorily than upon the newer; and it is obvious that no theory can stand which rests upon interpretations that are doubtful or unwarranted, or upon analogies which when inspected do not present sufficiently strong points of resemblance to render them useful for the purpose in hand. But though I feel convinced that Prof. Ridgeway's case in regard to the origin of Tragedy is not, for the most part, a good one, either in its destructive or its constructive aspect, I gladly add my testimony to the
