Background and introduction

Ageing [1] is a multifaceted, natural process involving physical, psychological, and social changes as one ages. At a biological level, ageing is linked with the gradual accumulation of a diverse range of molecular and cellular damage [2]. This damage ultimately causes a decline in physiological reserves and an increased susceptibility to various illnesses [3]. As evidence suggests that age-related functional decline is associated with end-of-life rather than being driven incrementally by age [4], it is crucial to avoid making a linear connection between increasing age and declining health and capability [3]. In instances of biological ageing, geriatric services are often required to provide specialized medical care for the unique health needs of the older population.

According to the United Nations (UN), there has been an unprecedented acceleration in the global proportion of older adults (aged 65 or over) [5]. The organization estimates that the percentage of older adults will increase globally from 10% in 2022 to 16% in 2050. Moreover, the UN predicts that by 2050, several regions will experience a growing ageing population, with one in every four persons in Europe, Northern America, and Eastern and South-Eastern Asia being aged 65 years and over [5].

The anticipated demographic shift towards an ageing population is expected to have far-reaching effects on healthcare and economic demands, particularly in the previously mentioned regions. Without adequate solutions by healthcare services to address this shift, the demand for geriatric services is likely to exceed the available healthcare resources, resulting in the healthcare industry struggling to cope with this demand. One instance of a valuable resource in healthcare is the presence of diagnostic radiographers, who offer radiology services that are essential in diagnosing (i.e. using various imaging modalities) and treating (i.e. extracorporeal shockwave lithotripsy, cardiac catheterization procedures, gastrografin challenges) various medical conditions. However, with a rising number of requests for radiology examinations [6], the current population of diagnostic radiographers worldwide [7,8] may prove inadequate to accommodate the increasing demands of the high geriatric patient population volume in the aforementioned regions.

In a Dutch qualitative study exploring the opinions of 26 nurses and how their work environments contributed to the way they cared for their patients in various care settings, it was revealed that insufficient nursing staff deployment was a factor preventing better patient care [9]. The results showed that even when there was inadequate staffing, the workload did not decrease; nursing teams still had to work at the same efficiency level despite the lesser manpower. To maintain that efficiency, nurses hence felt compelled to increase their own productivity levels by juggling more responsibilities or working more efficiently. However, this pressure to remain efficient can lead to nurses rushing through [10] or neglecting essential care activities [11], which can also compromise patient safety [12] and nurses' own well-being [13]. As the increasing ageing population requiring geriatric healthcare services continue to
