RELINKING LIFE AND WORK

BY RHONA RAPOPORT, LOTTE BAILYN,
DEBORAH KOLB, AND JOYCE K. FLETCHER

Editor's Note: The material in this article is based on a research project the authors completed in collaboration with Xerox Corporation, Tandem Computers, Inc., and Corning, Inc.

The modern workplace is far less than ideal for workers who want integrated lives. As one engineer put it, "The problem isn't for those who have decided to put work first and family second. They can do just fine here. And it isn't for those who give false reasons for leaving work early. They feel that attending a community board or civic meeting is not likely to brand them as uncommitted, while taking a child for a physical might. Some secretly take children on business trips. Others leave their computers on while picking up children from sporting events, hoping that colleagues passing by will think they are in a meeting.

When Individuals Try to leader rotated group members to take her place on the fifth day, she developed their self-management skills. By all measures, including productivity and satisfaction, the group was thriving. But the arrangement did not last long. In the end, the manager was stripped of her supervisory duties and moved to the bottom category of performance. Management regarded the team leader's efforts as a negative reflection of her future potential and management capability. Similarly, a full-time sales techni-
