The establishment of a sand budget for the East Anglian coast and its implications for coastal stability

K. M. CLAYTON, I. N. McCABE and C. E. VINCENT, School of Environmental Sciences,
University of East Anglia

Based on field research and computer modelling, an outline sand budget has been established for the East Anglian coast. This budget shows that the sandy beaches of Norfolk, Suffolk, and northernmost Essex depend on the erosion of cliffs for their sand supply, and enables us to relate beach volumes to the rate of littoral drift. Economical coastal defence works should aim at maintaining high beach levels, which will protect structures and also favour the very important tourist trade. At some (although by no means all) locations sand feeds are likely to be more economical than improved walls or revetments.

GENERAL APPRAISAL

1. Engineers are called in to defend ever-increasing sections of the soft rock coasts of the UK, and by now schemes have been carried out along more than half of the East Anglian coast, and have been considered for much of the balance. Such schemes, whether concerned with sea defence or coast protection cannot succeed unless the works are developed in such a way as to retain a good beach. As the United States Coastal Engineering Research Center states unequivocally in the introduction to its Coastal Engineering Manual, "a good beach is the best form of coast defence", and all coastal engineers will be well aware that defences can be less substantial, less costly and will last longer when they are fronted by a substantial beach. Equally, failure of coastal defences is rapidly brought about by a decline in beach levels.

2. From these well established observations will be seen the significance of the coastal sediment budget. Processes which move sand and shingle on, off or along the beach control beach volume. If these processes are understood they may at least be used to predict beach volume changes, and might well be used at the design stage to improve the performance of defences in the retention of the beach, and thus prolong their life. Further, if structures which themselves degrade beaches can be avoided, then the natural protection of the beaches can operate along the greatest possible length of the coastline. This will not only minimise expenditure on coastal protection and sea defence works, but will also reduce the length of coast cluttered and disfigured by engineering structures, particularly where these are exposed to a greater degree than intended by loss of beach level.

3. Over the 7 years from 1974 to 1980, financed by two contracts from the Department of the Environment, we have used a variety of techniques to monitor sand movement on the East

Anglian Coast. Current techniques allow us to measure inputs to the beach from erosion of the land, and losses from the beach to the land where progradation occurs. Precision here is high, probably within 10% for additions to the beach, and about 5% for losses through progradation. Secondly we can calculate the rate of littoral drift for each short (say c.5km) section of coast: here precision is probably no better than 20%, although normally the long-term direction of drift is quite clear. Thirdly changes in beach volume and width can be measured by repeated survey: here the precision approaches 10%. What we cannot measure directly at present is offshore or onshore movement of sand, and this has to appear as a residual value. Given the imprecision in the other elements of the sediment (sand) balance, the precise location of areas of loss (primarily) or gain (possibly absent and certainly uncommon) is rarely possible, while derived values are likely to vary from as little as half to twice the real amount. Nevertheless, the total amounts of sand moving offshore are large enough for them to be recognizable as inputs to the offshore system, so that qualitative rather than quantitative confirmation of the pattern is available (see paragraph 11).

4. The budget we have established is that in operation today, and must depart to some extent from the natural system that would operate had no engineering works been constructed. In particular, the successful protection of some of the lower cliffs by sea walls and groynes has reduced local sediment inputs, while groynes effect a short term reduction in longshore transport, at least while beach volumes build up. It is possible to quantify these reductions where cliff defences have been installed since the second editions of the large-scale OS maps (i.e. around 1905), but the volumes involved are not very large, and even with an allowance for earlier defences at ports and seaside towns, we are probably recording a decline in natural sediment input no greater than  $100\,000\text{ m}^3\text{ yr}^{-1}$  or less than 20% of the natural inputs prior to the
