

CHAPTER 10 - RADIATION DETECTION AND MEASUREMENT

The most widely used radiation detectors are devices that respond to ionizing radiation by producing electrical pulses. The pulses are generated by the imparting of energy to electrons by the ionizing particles in the sensitive volume of the counter.

There are two major modes of signal production. In one mode, the deposited energy serves to trigger an output electrical pulse of constant form every time an interaction occurs. The output pulse is constant regardless of the amount of energy deposited in the detector or the nature of the particle. The Geiger-Mueller counter exhibits this type of behavior.

In the other mode, the magnitude of the output pulse is proportional to the amount of energy deposited in the detector. Scintillation counters, gas proportional counters and semiconductor detectors exhibit this type of behavior.

In gas-filled detectors, the detector measures the electrical charge or current resulting from ionization of the gas by the radiation. Gas-filled detectors maintain an electric field within the gas. The field causes electrons and ions created by the incident radiation to migrate to their respective collecting electrodes.

As the electric field is increased, the freed electrons are accelerated and achieve sufficient kinetic energy to cause additional ionizations within the detector gas.

The electrons freed by these ionizations are accelerated by the field and cause additional ionizations. Thus, the initial ionizing event can lead to a cascade of ionizing events and free electrons. This phenomenon is known as a "Townshend avalanche" after its discoverer.

Under proper conditions, the number of secondary ionization events can be kept proportional to the number of primary ion pairs formed, but the total number of ions can be multiplied by a factor of many thousands.

If the applied voltage is sufficiently high, the space charge created by the positive ions becomes dominant in determining the subsequent history of the pulse.

Mettler, Bernard Burdick, 1967 Neutron energy spectra were experimentally determined at various positions in air ducts through concrete The ducted concrete structures studied were built as model entrances for protective shelters The spectra were determined for the case of 14 Mev neutrons impinging on the duct entrance and were based on activation analysis of threshold foil detectors foil sandwiches and bare and cadmium covered indium foils The experimentally determined spectra were compared to available spectra calculated by Monte Carlo techniques utilizing the ADONIS computer code From the spectra the dose was calculated and the results were normalized to the dose in free air at one centimeter from the source The normalized dose as a function of distance in the duct from the source is graphically compared for the several analysis techniques The data presented demonstrate that it is possible to determine the neutron energy spectrum in ducts by the technique of foil activation Such determinations are useful during the experimental optimization of the protection factor for the duct in which the inclusion of doors traps liners and special wall materials are considered The data presented herein form a basis for understanding the effect of duct geometry on the protection factor that is the inverse of the dose rate at various positions in the duct normalized to the dose rate at the entrance of the duct
