

Understanding Credit Risk: Measuring Credit Risk

Introduction

Credit risk is the risk that a bank or investor will incur an economic loss on a financial debt as a result of the failure by a borrower to make interest and principal payments in full and on time. In addition, credit risk is also the potential loss in value of a traded debt instrument as a result of a deterioration in the creditworthiness of the borrower (obligor), even if the borrower continues to service the debt and has not yet defaulted.

Credit risk is driven by a variety of components, including the risk of default of the borrower, the loss percentage incurred in the event of a default, and the exposure amount at the time of default. When entering into a credit exposure, the bank or investor needs to analyse and quantify the credit risk it is about to take on. It is implicit that credit risk analysis involves making a determination about a future event (that is, the potential future default of the borrower), the likelihood and timing of which are unknown. This lesson explains different approaches to measuring credit risk. We will first review the difference between absolute and relative measures of risk. You will then learn about different analytical techniques and tools for assessing credit risk, including tools most commonly used by banks. Lastly, you will get a high-level understanding of quantitative rating tools, how they work and how they can be deployed to enhance traditional credit risk analysis.

By the end of this lesson, you should be able to:

- Describe the difference between absolute and relative measurements.
- Explain the difference between fundamental (or "expert") judgment and statistical approaches to credit risk assessment.
- Identify the components that banks use for their internal risk rating tools and scorecards.
- Explain how market prices of financial instruments can be used for credit risk assessment.
- Outline at a high level the concepts that underpin structural credit risk models.

What You Need to Know

There are various ways to measure standalone credit risk, ranging from traditional fundamental analysis to more quantitative approaches, as depicted in the graph below.

The traditional way has been to apply a great deal of judgment and rely on the expert knowledge of the credit officer. At the opposite end of the spectrum are statistical models, which relate a combination of credit risk factors—both quantitative and qualitative—to historical default events through regression analysis and other statistical techniques. For larger borrowers that are publicly listed or have issued bond securities (or both), we can get a sense of what market participants collectively think about the
