bureaucrats architects and planners in the transforming mill lands of Central Mumbai this study asks How does the experience of work help people create a sense of themselves In asking this question I travel between the last privately owned operational textile mill which I call Dhanraj Spinning and Weaving Ltd and the chawls inhabited by Dhanraj s remaining work force Through these spaces I ask what the place of work is in the production of personhood By moving beyond the factory floor and into the domestic spaces of working class life the intersection of gender class caste ethnicity and regional origin is in direct and unavoidable conversation with large scale narratives of belonging In drawing attention to the simultaneity of multiple social positions I argue that both Mumbai s written working class history and its contemporary post industrial landscape actively omit the diversity of mill labor still evident on the factory floor and in the disappearing chawls Specifically I show how women and ethnic minorities are doubly marginalized through processes of transition However the dynamic built environment of postindustrial landscapes reflects the shifting livelihoods of poorer residents fighting to remain visible in urban centers This study demonstrates that while the built environment may change landscapes remain infused with memories Through ethnographic methodology paired with feminist geography queer theory and theories of urban space I excavate these traces of memory and juxtapose them against official narratives in order to make visible these processes of gendered erasure and racial anxiety While ethnographically specific to Mumbai this study speaks to current global economic and political trends of deindustrialization privatization and neoliberalism and highlights their gendered entailments

Mills for Sale Darryl D'Monte, 2006 Has the epitaph been written on the controversial redevelopment of land belonging to cotton mills in Mumbai The architects former planners and bureaucrats lawyers writers who have contributed to this book have done so with two purposes in mind The first is to bring home the tremendous opportunity that has been squandered so recklessly in the sale of 600 acres of mill land in the center of the island city The second is to point to the alternatives that still exist and what implications there are for other large derelict industrial sites This book has been illustrated with the work of several photographers and drawings of architects The authors hope that this book will serve to remind readers of what a city has lost and what needs to be done to avoid such monumental blunders in future
