'Her last photo' is the small caption next to a snapshot of Madeleine McCann shown wearing an angelic smile on her face while sitting on the beach. The headline in People's Magazine screams: 'From Victims to Suspects' (24 September, 2007). The smallness of 'little Maddie's' photograph is by far the most striking feature of a full eight-page spread of a crime story. The bulk of People's Magazine article on the recent shocking turn of events, which posits Maddie's mother as the 3-year-old's murder suspect, derives its appeal by positioning the readers as the 'moral majority' from whom scrutiny of Kate McCann (Maddie's mother), her evasions, inconsistency in testimony and purported 'false grief', can now be cast. In other words, a strangely voyeuristic sense of 'community' emerges from this new angle in the news about a crime against a child. In Media and Crime: A Critical Introduction, Yvonne Jewkes devotes an entire chapter to the media constructions of children in crime news, and writes, 'Although late modernity is frequently said to be characterized by fragmentation, surveillance, regulation, dangerousness and risk - all of which are said to mitigate against, if not make redundant the notion of community - individual life histories are structured, shaped and made sense of within frames of reference provided by the mass media...In fact, it may be precisely those "negative" characteristics of late modernity that fuel people's need for unity and...a sense of cohesion' (pp. 103–104).

The passage above from Jewkes's book illustrates well her approach to the study of the connection between crime and the media: an approach that blends a broad sociological view on the 'mediated society', a criminological standpoint on how crime has radically transformed society into an anomic, dangerous place requiring discipline, and a cultural studies perspective that theorizes late modernity as a formation that reproduces the contested notion of 'community'. Jewkes's book is thus a triangulated study, which contributes to a usefully interdisciplinary attempt to think through the relationship between media and crime. While it is written as a textbook, the rich and varied theoretical substance of, and case studies in, the book is suitable for research review purposes.
