

How to Write a Performance Contract

Just like any other form of contract, a performance contract is considered a legal document and should state clearly and thoroughly the terms being agreed by both parties.

Determine the need for using a performance contract

This purpose may range from performance evaluation or performance appraisal to agreement termination.

Identify the act that needs to be performed

Since performance contracts focus on having one or both parties do something, this act should actually be specified in the contract's content.

Negotiate with the client and set terms and provisions

Creating a legal contract will always involve a meeting of the parties who plan to enter the agreement.

Start writing the performance contract

By using a document processing tool, you can start writing the performance contract using information gathered during the meeting with the client.

Proofread the content of the contract

Legal documents should always be free from any errors, whether it's related to spelling or grammar.

Print the contract and give a copy to the client

It simply tells you to print the performance contract on paper and then sign it before giving a copy to the other party.
