

Survey: Quilt Artist Yoshiko Jinzenji's "bamboo dye"

2019.04.01

Dissertations

A world of "white" discovered in a lifestyle surrounded by nature

A single white cloth, hung in the corner of a gallery where handmade crafts are worked on. The almost transparent hue and soft hand feel resonated deeply in my heart, and when I asked what type of cloth it was, I discovered that "it was created by a dyeing and weaving artisan with a special technique using green bamboo." There are many traditional natural dyes found throughout the world, including indigo, sappanwood and madder, but I had little knowledge about the technique of using bamboo as a dye. Furthermore, I was intrigued about the idea of dyeing a piece of silk pure white, which was already white to begin with. Captivated by this technique, I decided to visit Yoshiko Jinzenji in her studio located in Otazu, Shiga Prefecture.

Yoshiko welcomed us at her studio, a beautiful open space surrounded by greenery and basking in the natural sunlight located halfway up Mount Hiei. "Before moving here, I built a studio on the island of Bali in Indonesia, where I lived for over 20 years, with the local traditional style of architecture, and have always been close to nature." Ever since Yoshiko, who boasts a long and distinguished career as a dyeing and weaving artisan and quilt artist, returned to Japan five years ago, she has started holding workshops and other activities inside her own studio, which is equipped with a spacious earthen floor kitchen and a small tearoom.
