The True Cost of Fast Fashion

I The holiday season is approaching and you are looking for a special outfit, which you know you might not wear again. So why buy something you'll only wear once? Thanks to online shopping and discount chain stores, it's not so difficult to find a bargain. And because of that, many people don't feel guilty wearing their clothes only once.

II There is even a name for it: "fast fashion". Fast fashion is an industry where people buy single-use clothes for a very small amount of money. Other single-use products such as plastic cups are frowned upon in today's culture of environmental awareness, so why do people think it's acceptable to discard clothes in the same way? 1 _____ Unknown to many consumers, fast fashion has a serious environmental impact. Clothing production worldwide has seen an enormous boom in recent years and people are buying more clothes. However, the vast majority of clothing is thrown away within a year. Unfortunately, many of these items are not recycled but end up in landfills.

III 2 _____ The top you bought for only £5 still had to be made by someone in a factory. When you consider all the shipping costs, in addition to the profit the shop needs to make, how much of that £5 goes to the factory worker? You may like the price tag, but are you prepared to pay the human cost of cheap clothes?

IV Fortunately, there are ways of dealing with fast fashion. For example, big fashion brands could take more responsibility by recycling the clothes that they produce. Customers could be persuaded to return their unwanted clothing to the place where they bought them. This frequently happens in other industries.

V 3 _____ Unfortunately, recycling cannot prevent the increase in clothes production. For that, the behaviour of the consumer needs to change. 4 _____ Realistically speaking, though, making your own clothes is not a practical option for many people, who do not have the skills necessary to do this.

VI Even if people cannot make their own clothes, they can fight against fast fashion in other ways. One way is to shop for clothes at second-hand stores. 5 _____ You won't find the shabby coats and damaged trousers, which used to be the norm, there. Second-hand clothes are also usually good value because they're much cheaper than the ones in the ordinary shops.

VII Perhaps you don't fancy wearing someone else's old clothes. In that case, there is another way to cut down on the amount of clothes you buy. By buying and wearing clothes that never go out of style, like jeans and a black T-shirt, there's no need to update your clothes so often. 6 _____ By making simple changes, perhaps we can all combat fast fashion.
