

- promote forestry practices with low environmental impact, such as selective logging or plantation forestry with native species, allowing for heterogeneity of tropandean forest components, such as palm trees, tree ferns and other species used for non-traditional forest products;
- incorporate forest engineers and practitioners of forest management into professional societies with certification in environmentally friendly design;
- increase the reach of Andean forestry and silviculture so as to encompass restoration ecology in their assessment practices;
- cease frontier expansion and begin rehabilitation with land uses that allow for a restitution of land cover;
- activate a regional system of georeference in forest use, including woodfuel and charcoal production, two of the largest causes of deforestation in the highlands;
- work with communities that conserve the traditional transhumance arrangement of seasonal migrations to recover part of the system by fallow;
- strengthen academic and professional societies, along with university courses and specialized consulting firms in the Andean countries.

If restoration ecology is not initiated in a formal manner, we will start seeing some crude examples of forest conversion and biological impoverishment of the last remnants of Andean forests in the region. To prevent this, IUFRO, FAO, IITF and other international organizations responsible for the forestry sector should prioritize montane, and in particular high Andean, forests in national or international programmes. Local forestry authorities and institutions should embrace the new paradigm of montology; of working living landscapes in the Andes. Ecotourism, ethnomedicine, carbon sequestration, air pollution cleansing, biodiversity enhancement and other features of protected cultural landscapes in the Andes will prove to be the best management practice for mountain forest conservation and development.

1.6 Climate oscillations and extremes

M. Beniston

When addressing interactions between climate, climatic change, and natural systems, it should be borne in mind that, in many instances, interannual and intra-annual variability of climate, and particularly extreme events, have far more significant impacts on forests than changes in 'mean climate'. In terms of sustainable mountain development, forests play several key roles, including protection against slope instability, and as a source of fuel and material for construction. Any change in environmental conditions, such as increased extreme precipitation, drought or storminess is likely to enhance the inherent
