Abstract: This paper provides an overview of features considered significant in the exploration and development of Lower Palaeozoic reservoirs of North Africa. Information is derived from a review of literature on the Lower Palaeozoic successions of north Africa, combined with outcrop observations from the Anti Atlas mountains of Morocco. The focus of the exploration-oriented part of the review is on identification of potential traps other than two-way structural dip closure. Stratigraphic elements described include depositional models of reservoir facies, tectonic unconformities and possible eustatic unconformities. Cases of established or potential trapping by post-depositional faulting, by diagenesis and by hydrodynamic flow are examined. Development-related topics highlighted include the impact on reservoir matrix quality of burial diagenesis and of palaeo-weathering at the Hercynian unconformity. Other issues discussed which additionally affect producibility from the reservoir matrix include tectonic fracturing, palaeotopography and unloading fracturing at the Hercynian unconformity, and induced fracturing within the present stress regimes.

The Cambrian to Silurian sequences of Algeria, Libya and Tunisia form one of the world's greatest concentrations of Lower Palaeozoic reservoirs. Algeria contains the largest number of fields discovered to date, including the giant field of Hassi Messaoud (Fig. 1). Libya also has substantial production from the Lower Palaeozoic, which is in the process of being boosted by new fields under development in the Murzuq Basin. Minor but potentially significant relatively deep discoveries have also been made in Tunisia. Equivalent sequences in Egypt, Morocco (including former Western Sahara), Niger and Chad might also have hydrocarbon potential (see below).

To date, exploration for Lower Palaeozoic prospects has mainly focused on structural highs. As a consequence there are large areas, even close to producing fields, which remain undrilled. Most producing fields are situated on convincing
