

measures have their writing achievement assessment (i.e., content, organization, style, and conventions). To help students develop a sense of what constitutes a strong example of a particular trait, teachers can have students listen to or read excerpts from a touchstone text (which could be a student writing sample) to (a) identify the primary trait evident in the excerpts and (b) identify concrete evidence for characterizing a piece of writing as strong on that particular trait.

Teachers also might ask students to develop their own definition for the trait and/or the descriptors for different scores on a trait rubric by examining superb, average, and weak examples. It is better to limit the number of traits that receive instructional focus at any given time to one or two; the decision regarding which traits are targeted should be guided by the genre and form of writing being taught as well as students' needs.

Teaching Writing Mechanics and Conventions Elementary school teachers must explicitly teach spelling and handwriting to their students (this is not to say that secondary educators do not address these skills, but they do so to a lesser extent). For students with disabilities and for other struggling writers, more extensive practice and review of spelling, vocabulary, and letter forms and the thoughtful application of Whether teaching spelling or handwriting, certain curriculum considerations should be addressed, including the following: Sequencing skills or grouping elements (words or letters) in developmentally and instructionally appropriate ways; Providing students opportunities to generalize spelling and handwriting skills to text composition; Using activities that promote independence; Establishing weekly routines (e.g., pretest/posttest, distributed and cumulative daily practice); Providing spelling or handwriting instruction for 15 minutes per day; Introducing the elements at the beginning of the instructional cycle; Modeling how to spell the words or write the letters correctly; Highlighting patterns and pointing out distinctive attributes (or having students "discover"); and Giving students ample opportunity to practice with immediate corrective feedback.

Students should spend time practicing the elements being taught and self-evaluating their performance, with the teacher frequently checking their work and correcting errors as necessary. Depending on how well the students do, the teacher may teach additional skills lessons. The students also might work with each other to study/practice and evaluate each other's work. Finally, at the end of a cycle of instruction, the teacher should assess how well the students learned the elements.

Models of Instructional Design Writing

The different approaches to instructional design are nowhere more obvious than in the ever-growing list of models. Groppe (1977) has provided an analysis of instructional design models used in higher education environments. Extending Groppe's list, Andrews and Goodson (1980) analysed 40 models and concluded that instructional design models can serve the following purposes: Improving learning and
