

Oral Surgery

Lecture: 2

Dr. Saif Saadedeen

“Surgical anatomy in local anesthesia”

An understanding of the management of pain in dentistry requires a thorough knowledge of the fifth (V) cranial nerve. The right and left trigeminal nerves provide the majority of sensory innervation from teeth, bone, and soft tissues of the oral cavity. The trigeminal nerve is the largest of the twelve cranial nerves. It is composed of a small motor root and a larger sensory root.

The three sensory divisions of the trigeminal nerve are:

1. The ophthalmic division (V1) exits the skull through the superior orbital fissure into the orbit. It is the first branch of the trigeminal nerve, purely sensory and is the smallest of the three divisions.
2. The maxillary division (V2) exits the skull through the foramen rotundum into the upper portion of the pterygopalatine fossa. It is intermediate in size between ophthalmic and mandibular divisions. It is purely sensory in function.
3. The mandibular division (V3) exits the skull, along with the motor root, through the foramen ovale. Just after leaving the skull, the motor root unites with the sensory root of the mandibular division to form a single nerve trunk that enters the infratemporal fossa.

Maxillary Division (V2)

Once outside the cranium, the maxillary nerve crosses the uppermost part of the pterygopalatine fossa. It then enters the orbit through the inferior orbital fissure occupying the infraorbital groove and becomes the infraorbital nerve, which courses anteriorly into the infraorbital canal. The following is a summary of maxillary division innervation:

1. Skin (middle portion of the face, lower eyelid, side of the nose and upper lip).
2. Mucous membrane (nasopharynx, maxillary sinus, soft palate, tonsil and hard palate).
3. Maxillary teeth and periodontal tissues
