New Forces at Work Steven W. Popper, Caroline S. Wagner, Eric Victor Larson, 1998 As part of the effort to produce the fourth National Critical Technologies Report the Office of Science and Technology Policy in the Executive Office of the President asked a research team from RAND s Critical Technologies Institute now named Science and Technology Policy Institute to engage business and industry leaders explicitly in a discussion of the issue of critical technologies by gathering private sector views on what technologies are appropriate to consider under this rubric and why The primary substantive input was elicited through extended detailed interviews conducted individually usually with one firm s senior executive per session on site in most cases The report presents and analyzes interviewees responses to what technologies they consider to be critical to their firm or industry explores the question of what critical technology means reports interviewees assessments of the status of U S efforts and performance in the areas of technology they deemed critical considers the respective roles of industry universities and government in contributing to and sustaining the U S technology base suggests a process whereby the dialogue between government and industry on the public policy issues relating to technology might be made more integral and informative to the activities of both The responses of many of the interviewees emphasized the aspect of technology as process over technology as product In line with this vision the authors propose a critical technologies review process that would enable wider more meaningful and ongoing communication among industry government and universities on technology issues

Learning and Innovation in Natural Resource Based Industries Allan Dahl Andersen, Anabel Marín, 2020-06-04 This book develops and articulates a new perspective on the relationship between natural resources and development by foregrounding issues of innovation knowledge and industrial dynamics Despite growing academic attention to the relationship between economic development and natural resources in social sciences the issue has received rather limited attention in the field of Innovation Studies This is problematic given the centrality of innovation and technological change for growth and development Against that background this book makes three contributions Firstly it summarizes and synthesizes existing insights about learning and innovation in Natural Resource Based Industries Secondly it develops new insights based on original research work Thirdly it distils and explains the remaining research challenges in the field Containing important insights for researchers businesses and policymakers this book will be useful to all those with an interest in navigating a natural resource based development pathway This book was originally published as a special issue of Innovation and Development

Producing Liquid Fuels from Coal James T. Bartis, Frank A. Camm, David Santana Ortiz, 2008 Record high world oil prices have prompted renewed interest in producing liquid fuels from coal The United States leads the world in recoverable coal reserves Moreover the technology for converting coal to liquid fuels already exists and production costs appear competitive at world oil prices well below current levels Yet despite its promise private investment in coal to liquids CTL technology is being impeded by three uncertainties where oil prices are heading what it actually costs to produce coal derived fuels and how greenhouse gas emissions will be regulated A domestic CTL industry could produce as much as three million barrels per day of transportation fuels by 2030 Having such an industry would yield important energy security benefits most notably a lowering of world oil prices and a decrease in wealth transfers from oil users to oil producers But establishing a large CTL industry also raises important policy and environmental issues associated with climate change coal mining and water consumption Weighing both benefits and costs it makes sense for the United States to pursue an insurance or hedge strategy that promotes the early construction and operation of a limited number of commercial CTL plants This book presents an in depth review of the prospects of and policy governance and environmental issues associated with establishing a CTL industry in the United States provided by publisher High Price of Natural Gas United States. Congress. Senate. Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, 2003

Camm, James T. Bartis, 2008 This technical report explains an analytic way to design and assess packages of financial incentives that the government can use to cost effectively promote early experience with coal to liquids CTL production of liquid fuels in the face of significant uncertainty about the future The report applies two complementary analytic methods The first uses observations from successful voluntary agreements in the commercial world to identify principles that the government can use to design a relationship with a private investor that is likely to ensure that early CTL production experience occurs cost effectively Such a relationship yields investor and government behavior that in turn generates a set of cash flows to and from investor and government over time The second analytic method takes these cash flows as given and assesses their effects on the investor and the government It measures effects on an investor in terms of changes in the investor's real adjusted for inflation after tax internal rate of return IRR It measures effects on the government in terms of changes in the real net present value NPV of cash flows to and from the government when assessed at the discount rate set by the Office of Management and Budget OMB for investments of this kind The cash flow analysis focuses on a hypothetical CTL combined cycle production plant that uses a Fischer Tropsch FT technology to convert coal
