Marine Anemones and Anemones

Many marine animals find shelter in the anemones' tentacles. But the sea anemones themselves are not so lucky. They are often preyed upon by larger fish, and they are also eaten by some sea urchins. However, the clownfishes that live in the anemones' tentacles are immune to their stinging cells. The clownfishes are able to avoid the stinging cells by having a special mucus coating on their bodies. This mucus coating is made from the anemone's own mucus, and it is this mucus that makes the clownfishes immune to the anemone's stinging cells.
