ABSTRACT

The design of mechanical ventilation systems for small, tightly sealed buildings is a complex task. This paper presents a modeling study of ventilation in manufactured houses. The study involves the use of a computer program to simulate the airflow and contaminant concentrations in a house with various ventilation systems. The results of the study are presented in this paper, and the implications for the design of ventilation systems for small buildings are discussed.

INTRODUCTION

The design of mechanical ventilation systems for small, tightly sealed buildings is a complex task. This paper presents a modeling study of ventilation in manufactured houses. The study involves the use of a computer program to simulate the airflow and contaminant concentrations in a house with various ventilation systems. The results of the study are presented in this paper, and the implications for the design of ventilation systems for small buildings are discussed.

The first problem in the design of mechanical ventilation systems for small buildings is the determination of the required ventilation rate. This is typically done by using a simplified model of the building's airflow. The second problem is the selection of a ventilation system that can provide the required ventilation rate. This is typically done by comparing the performance of various ventilation systems. The third problem is the design of the ventilation system. This involves the selection of the components of the system and the determination of their sizes and locations.
