ABSTRACT

Background: Low threshold methadone maintenance (MMT) was developed for clients who do not have abstinence as a treatment goal. We explored how MMT programs in Canada defined low threshold and the challenges they faced.

Methods: Using semi-structured interviews, we collected data from clients ($n=46$), nurses/counsellors ($n=15$) and physicians ($n=9$) at three low threshold MMT programs. All participants were asked to define low threshold MMT and describe how it was implemented in practice. Interviews were taped, transcribed, verified and analysed using an iterative thematic coding technique.

Results: Low threshold MMT was defined by an explicit rejection of abstinence from opiates and other drugs as an over-arching treatment goal. In the absence of guidelines defining a set of practices as low threshold, programs implemented practices they believed would reduce barriers to admission and help retention. There was not always agreement between professional groups or across the programs regarding these practices. For physicians, there was a tension between accepting poly-drug use during treatment as a means to improve retention, with an obligation to do more good than harm for their patients. Missed prescribing appointments generated few to severe consequences and revealed differential focus on reducing barriers versus encouraging client ownership of treatment. Differences of opinion regarding appropriate urine drug testing practices revealed power dynamics between medical and non-medical staff.

Conclusion: Our findings show that there are potentially more ways to reduce barriers to MMT than those presented in the current literature. Our findings are important given the growing number of people with opiate dependence across the world and calls to increase access to MMT. To fully develop the low threshold model, it will be important to evaluate what policies and practices can achieve the goals of reducing barriers to admission and improving retention in treatment.

Introduction

Methadone maintenance treatment (MMT) was designed by Dole and Nyswander \(1955\) to manage opioid dependence, which they characterized as a permanent metabolic deficiency. To block cravings and stabilize this deficiency, they advocated for long-term maintenance of the client and provision of ancillary services (Dole & Nyswander, 1955). As Ward, Matick, and Hall \(1998\) note, MMT quickly became the most common treatment for opiate dependence. However, it underwent significant changes in the United States in terms of its goals, dosage and ancillary services and its focus on ‘maintenance’ was diminished (Ward et al., 1998). Whilst, Dole and Nyswander \(1955\) designed a program with long term goals, newer models have moved towards shorter duration of treatment and abstinence within a few years (Ward et al., 1998).

However, in the 1980s the pendulum swung back towards a maintenance approach, with the introduction of a ‘low threshold’ MMT model. This emerged to reduce barriers to admission and retention in MMT amongst people for whom abstinence from all drugs was not their goal, but who might benefit in other ways from treatment (Katzman, 1990). Two MMT policies in particular were identified as barriers: abstinence from all drugs as a condition of entry into treatment and abstinence from all drugs, including non-opioids, throughout the entire course of treatment. The first low threshold programs, such as ‘methadone by bus’ in Amsterdam, tried to remove these barriers. This program was designed for a group of mostly black heroin users who did not use services and experienced many health and social problems (Buning, Van Brunt, & Van Sanden, 1990). The goal of methadone by bus was to stabilize opiate dependence, provide regular contact for clients, and address other health and social problems. Although not an original
