Abstract

This article explores the current literature on ‘research impact’ in the social sciences and humanities (SSH). By providing a comprehensive review of available literature, drawing on national and international experiences, we take a systematic look at the impact agenda within SSH. The primary objective of this article is to examine key methodological components used to assess research impact comparing the advantages and disadvantages of each method. The study finds that research impact is a highly complex and contested concept in the SSH literature. Drawing on the strong methodological pluralism emerging in the literature, we conclude that there is considerable room for researchers, universities, and funding agencies to establish impact assessment tools directed towards specific missions while avoiding catch-all indicators and universal metrics.

Key words: research evaluation; impact assessment; social sciences and humanities; literature review.

Introduction

Across the international research and innovation community there is a growing interest in how to assess and communicate the diverse impacts of scholarly work. Being able to demonstrate the societal uptake and value of social sciences and humanities (SSH) research is increasingly seen as a crucial component in ensuring accountability and transparency (Penfield et al. 2014; Morton 2015; Greenhalgh et al. 2016; Rasmussen et al. 2017). In recent years, the notion of ‘research impact’ has gained significant traction within the science system, and has been embedded in research policies, funding instruments, and evaluation regimes (e.g. Rip 2000; Holbroek and Frodeman 2011; Rasmussen 2013; Buchanan 2013; Langfeldt and Scandura 2015; Derrick and Samuel 2017; Holbroek 2017; Reale et al. 2017). In this article, we provide an overview of the existing methods for broader impact assessments across SSH.

A key finding of the literature review is that different funding agencies, policy-makers, and research organisations operate with different models and methods for impact assessment. Impact simply does not mean the same thing across institutions, geographies, and research cultures. This conceptual diversity is reflected in the number of methods and frameworks which are used to track, demonstrate, assess, and incentivise the impact of research across the European SSH community and beyond. The diversity of the impact agenda in SSH reflects a broader trend within impact studies. The evolution of impact studies has shown that public research organisations do not just release their benefits to society following a linear model of growth and application. Instead, real-world effects of research occur at different stages in the research process, extending from knowledge dissemination and knowledge mobilisation to long-term applications and dynamic effects.

Much progress has been made in measuring both the outcomes of research and the processes and activities through which these are achieved (Greenhalgh et al. 2016). However, as we demonstrate in this article, there exists a multitude of approaches to impact assessment reflecting the complex and multi-dimensional ways in which research is taken up by society. As Reale (2017) noted at the Science, Technology, and Innovation Indicators Conference in 2017: ‘The contributions of science to society are so varied, and mediated by so many different actors, that indicators used in impact assessment cannot be universal. Instead, they need to be developed for given contexts and used alongside qualitative assessment’. Assessing the impact of social science and humanities is indeed challenging. The ways in which research is taken up, used, and revised in real-world settings mean that tracking research processes or outputs to wider changes is difficult, and timescales are hard to predict (Morton 2015). However, rather than being paralysed by the lack
