

Collectively, the three examples illustrate how different stability conditions affect cloud formation. In each case, the surrounding environmental temperature determines atmospheric stability and the fate of a rising air parcel.

Using one final example, let us examine how a meteorologist would measure atmospheric instability and determine whether to issue a thunderstorm forecast. Consider an air parcel that rises from the surface to 3 kilometers. The surface temperature is 31°C, dew-point temperature 23°C, and pressure 1010 mb. Table 4 lists the measured temperature of the surrounding atmosphere through which the parcel rises.

22. What is the lifting condensation level in this example?
3 km

23. Enter the correct parcel temperatures and parcel dew points to complete Table 4. (Assume that the WALR = 5°C/km.)
24. Using the diagram on the next page and Figures 5 through 7 as models:
 a. Plot the parcel and environmental temperatures from Table 4.
 b. Show the lifting condensation level and draw likely cloud development.
 c. Identify any stable or unstable layers.
25. Would you forecast thunderstorms during these conditions? Explain your answer.
