

life and it is looked upon as the picturesque repository of conservatism and unreality. Conversely, the political and social activists are the products of the secular state schools.

Sympathy is not one of the qualities with which Takdir Alisjahbana views Sukarno, whom he calls "sensual and monumental." He comments bitingly that "from a person who fought for the liberation of his people from the suppression of the arbitrary acts of a colonial government, he developed into a man who suppresses and who acts arbitrarily towards his own people." Sukarno first revealed his opportunism, according to the author, by collaborating between 1942 and 1945 with the Japanese regime which was more oppressive than that of the Dutch. However, such collaboration was not untypical of numerous Southeast Asian leaders—Aung San, Roxas, Pibunsongkhram. Even in Indonesia some leaders who receive the author's approval—Hatta, Natsir, Roem—did little or nothing to subvert Japanese rule. To all these leaders there was a presumed difference between the Japanese and the Europeans, not only in terms of color, but also in terms of anticipated decolonialization.

Sukarno's most extreme act of arbitrariness was the dismissal in 1959 of the Konstituante and the return to the 1945 constitution, an act which ridiculed the idea of trias politica, the foundation of any democratic state. Yet Takdir Alisjahbana tends to isolate these decisions from the persistent inability of the previous governments to solve problems. The increasing disillusionment of the population outside Java with their continued lack of attention from the center was as much a failure of the political parties and the representative structure, neither of which Sukarno created, as it was of Sukarno's attempt to perpetuate his own reign. The author assumes Sukarno's preoccupation with monument-building was part of the same drive and not a necessary ingredient of nation-building.

What makes this book valuable is that it is a candid observation of the mores of his own country by a most articulate and well-informed Indonesian. His acceptance of national myths—the great empire of Modjopahit, or the ancient village "republics"—just as the rejection of others—pantjasila, "a bag of verbal tricks"—reveals him to be a true Indonesian. Perhaps more than any of his countrymen, Takdir Alisjahbana has been involved in all the movements he describes, and he discusses them knowingly and intimately.

Person, Time, and Conduct in Bali: An Essay in Cultural Analysis. By CLIFFORD GEERTZ. (Cultural Report Series No. 14.) Yale University: Southeast Asia Studies, 1966. iii, 85 pp. Notes, List of Publications. n.p.

Clifford Geertz has here, in relatively few pages, presented an elegantly reasoned and precisely phrased analysis of certain aspects of Balinese culture. The author's interest is primarily in the development of a scheme for the perception and analysis of culture—in relating this to a specific corpus of ethnographic data and in drawing implications for the wider, comparative study of human culture and society. Given this orientation, Geertz intentionally limits the space devoted to purely ethnographic description, presenting only enough facts to orient the reader. Other works by C. and H. Geertz, already published or forthcoming, provide the fuller documentation of Balinese culture. Presented with a book of this nature the reader may legitimately ask (1) What does Geertz say new about the Balinese; what new insights does he provide for an understanding of Balinese behavior? Despite the brevity of factual data, the book under review is a definite contribution in this respect. (2) To what extent does the author's theoretical scheme provide new insights; further our ability to subject cultural phenomena to scientific analysis; or provide us with crossculturally valid concepts? The answer here again would seem to be generally in the affirmative, although subject to some serious reservations.

The author begins his theoretical argument by assuming a (Parsonian) distinction between culture and social structure—between ideation and action—a major premise with which not all anthropologists would find themselves in agreement. He then addresses himself to the admittedly difficult problem of conceptualizing culture (ideas, beliefs, values) in such a way that these can be subjected to scientific analysis. Thinking is a social phenomenon in the
